This is not least due to the scarcity of sources, to territorial fragmentation – particularly in central Europe – up to the lateth century, to the extremely fragmented recording of commodity flows, and to the difficulty involved in using non-comparable figures, the dependability of which is unknown, for hundreds of regions and countries for different periods. It enables interaction and connectivity, and – if all other prerequisites are satisfied – it presents the opportunity to read signals from the global market and to integrate this information into the domestic economy to obtain an economic advantage through further specialization or productivity increases. In when the British Parliamentary Committee on Small Arms questioned gun maker Samuel Colt and machine tool makers James Nasmyth and Joseph Whitworth there was still some question about what constituted interchangeability and whether it could be achieved at a reasonable cost.
